

IF NATURE COULD SPEAK...

If the forests could speak, they would ask why the trees that protect our rivers are disappearing.

If the caves could speak, they would ask why places that have existed for centuries are being neglected.

If the waterfalls could speak, they would ask why the beauty that inspires us is being left unprotected.

If the ancient rock formations could speak, they would ask why monuments of nature that have witnessed generations are being threatened.

And if future generations could speak today, they would ask one simple question:

"What did you do to protect the natural treasures you inherited?"

Ecotourism is not merely about visiting beautiful places. It is about making a decision that nature deserves protection, that communities deserve opportunities, and that our children deserve to inherit a world that is still rich in beauty and biodiversity.

A protected natural attraction can educate a child, support a community, inspire scientific discovery, create sustainable livelihoods, and become a source of pride for an entire nation. But once these treasures are destroyed, they may never be replaced.

The future of our forests, waterfalls, caves, rock formations, and wildlife habitats will not be determined by tomorrow's decisions. It will be determined by what we choose to do today.

We did not create these natural treasures. We inherited them.

Century upon century, our ancestors protected these places and passed them from one generation to another. They understood that nature is not a possession to be consumed, but a heritage to be safeguarded.

Let us become the generation that protects what we did not create and preserves what we inherited, so that generations yet unborn may inherit the same natural wonders that inspire us today.

The choices we make today will determine the natural heritage we leave behind tomorrow.

We inherited these treasures. We cannot create them. Therefore, we must protect them.
